For the ACT, many students struggle with the Science section. Strong fundamentals in laboratory science methodology and basic statistical literacy are invaluable here; every high school junior or senior should be taking a rigorous lab science course (chemistry, biology, or physics).

For the SAT, many students struggle to internalize the necessity of evidence-based reading. The answers to the questions are written in the passage, if only the student can find them.

For the SSAT, the single most difficult thing to do is learn new vocabulary words. A high Verbal score requires a massive vocabulary, and many students are way behind at the beginning of their preparation. Diligence in keeping and regularly drilling vocabulary lists is the only way to success.

Read.
Read a lot. Read everything that interests you. Listen to audiobooks. Watch video essays and documentaries. Go to TED talks. Find a topic you love and absolutely geek out on it. Find the smartest people saying the smartest things (in whatever format, on whatever topic), and engage with their material. There’s no classroom substitute for the life practice of grappling with rigorous content, exercising your critical thinking skills, and surrounding yourself with good language and articulation. I don’t care what your angle is; find your way into where the smart people are and live there.

Invest time.
Very few of the skills you need for literary analysis, argument construction, and clear articulation are skills you can pick up quickly or by last-minute cramming. Because literary study always involves a fresh encounter with a new (to you) text, there is always an aspect of risk and of the unfamiliar involved. The more complete your skillset and the deeper your experience, the better you’ll be able to handle that encounter, but it’s always uncharted ground. Therefore, invest the time in practicing your skills, building your experience, and refining your technique. This isn’t really a subject for short cuts.
